A fascinating place in Belper's history...

Belper's Unitarian chapel is hidden away up Field Row off Green Lane. It is of architectural interest and is the oldest place of continuous worship in the town.

The Act of Uniformity (1662) sought to impose a uniformity of belief and worship. Some clergy refused to conform and lost their living but several continued to preach – this was the beginning of non-conformist worship. In 1689 John Taylor obtained a licence to hold services at his house in Belper and this was the beginning of the non-conformist movement here. In 1721 a meeting house was built on Green Lane.

Jedediah Strutt harnessed the power of the River Derwent and built his cotton spinning mills in Belper from 1776 – these are now part of the Derwent Valley Mills World Heritage Site. He built houses and developed a community for his workers. Jedediah was a Unitarian and built the present chapel in 1788 – it was extended a few years later and the chapel cottage added at that time.

The stone chapel has a cantilevered stairway leading to the gallery. Most of the interior is original with box pews, commemorative plaques and a John Whitehurst clock. There is an arched catacomb beneath the boxed pews where Strutt family members are interred. Jedediah Strutt himself is buried beneath the catacomb.

...and continuing spiritual home of local Unitarians.

Voices

“As a Unitarian I am on a personal journey of spiritual discovery that will take a lifetime... or longer.”

“Unitarians believe that there can be no exclusive claim to truth in religion or in the search for the meaning of life.”

“An amazing thing is the wide range of views that co-exist quite happily. At Belper we have liberal Christians, religious humanists, earth centred pagans, universalists, Buddhists, atheists and all kinds of hybrids. The diversity is really exciting!”

“One week the readings might be from the Bible and the Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy and the next week from the Bhagavad Gita and the works of Dickens or Gaskell. You can never be sure what you'll get next!”

“We worship God (but nobody tells us what kind of God...!), we celebrate life, we try to serve humanity and respect all creation.”

“It is so refreshing being able to honour the Christianity of my upbringing without having to agree literally with any specific part of it. And being able to set it aside when it doesn't speak to my need or understanding.”

“As a newcomer to Unitarianism my view of God has grown bigger without me becoming smaller.”

“We share a religious pilgrimage of discovery, learning, and being challenged, without dogmatic assertion.”

“I don't find the word 'God' useful and I still feel very welcome in this Unitarian chapel.”

“Unitarians have no prescribed beliefs or restrictive creed. We are free to search worldwide sources and philosophies for increased understanding and to nurture our own spirituality.”
